EUROPEAN SILVER.

The pretext advanced by pretended friends of silver that free coinage would open our mints to all the silver of Europe was effectually disposed of by Senator Vest in a recent speech. Vest has been an able advocate of free coinage in the Senate and on the stump, and fully un-

"The stock of silver held by European countries is not bullion, but primary coin, which does not fluctuate with the Mrs. Fair's Will Filed for Probate at price of silver. The Bank of France uses silver as legal tender primary money for the redemption of its paper circulation, just as it holds its gold. It has $254,838,000 of silver and $267,855,-000 of gold, and it needs both. The same thing is true of Germany, with $107,000,000 worth of legal tender silver thalers, of which the Imperial Bank holds $48,000,000, this with $180,000,000 in gold constituting its cash reserves. Thus legal tender silver coin is affoat in Europe of the valuation at which it is issued, viz: 15.5 to 1 in gold, and if we take our gold dollar as the unit of comparison that silver money would yield 359 91 grains of pure silver as against our mint requirement of 371 25 grains. Anyone bringing this European silver money to exchange at our mints, if we grains of silver in the United States and poison, also a Smith & Wesson 38 calibre $1 for 359.91 grains in Europe, or $1 29 pistol were found between the bodies. transportation.'

Contagious Disease.

Individual resistance to contagion is none the less remarkable. A physician or masse will be brought into the most intimate contact with a case of contagi ons disease without contracting it, while the same patient may communicate it to a person jassing him in the street, in the early stages of his trouble, before it has developed sufficiently to cause any We have known of a most malignant attack of diphtheria communicated to a druggist by a person calling at the store before his disease had fully developed itself; and a lady suffering from the mumps succeeded in communicating them to a sympathizing neighbor who stopped for a moment at the door to inquire after her health, while other members of the family residing in the same house remained unaffected.—Popu-

Problematic Scalptures. The valley of John Day river, a modest tributary of the Columbia, seems to have become a rendezvous of far western archæologists Sculptures, carved into a basultic ledge of that neighborhood, are supposed to represent "anthropoid apes," and the question is where the Oregon Indians could have seen the originals of those emblems. In Sumatra, India, or some ape haunted region of the western continent? A less romantic so lation of the enigma would be the conjecture that the sculptures in question do not represent apes at all, but bears or barbarians.—Philadelphia Times.

which depicted a lusty barelegged boy on a rock, with a polo cap crowning a shock of yellow hair parted in the back, a bow in his hand and his eyes fixed on a sponting whale that looked like a sardine sneezing violently, the panorama opened with the "family" kneeling in grateful prayer for its escape. The father, with head bald on top, smooth shaven face and long locks of white hair falling on his shoulders was the central figure, and made an ideal vicar of Wakefield. Fritz, the eldest son, were a long coat and long trousers, and Franz, the youngest, was distinguished by a large button on his coat in the small of the back. This was in the fore-

Then there came a lightning change. In five minutes their father's whiskers had grown an inch or two, Fritz and he had gotten into knickerbockers, terminating in the father's case in blue stockings and buckled shoes, both of them had lost the curl out of their hair, and one of the bulldogs had been metamorphosed into a setter standing over a redish brown rabbit that was declared in the text to be an agouti.

Noon, the next day, and the father and Fritz were again presented, seated this time by a brook, but conveniently near a stone jug that might have held molasses and might not. The father looked like a Highlander in a farmer's clothes, and Fritz, who had grown three or four years older, was dressed like Danton when that gentleman was of some consequence in Paris and looked like him. One of the dogs had become a King Charles spaniel. The other did not appear, but was probably in seclusion, settling on the breed in which he would

That night the father shaved himself down to the side whiskers, dyed his own and Fritz's hair black, put a sailor shirt on himself and a pair of striped lawn tennis trousers on Fritz, and the next morning went out sailing. While they were absent the Jewish faced mother changed her countenance for a subdued Irish, arrayed herself in a dark blue gown that disclosed a red petticoat, and put a yellow handkerchief on her head. Taking Jack, one of her other sons, and putting a trim polo cap on his yellow locks, the two, accompanied by one of

A day or two later the father had gotten back his full, yellow beard, which he seemed to wear with his peasant costume, and one of the dogs had changed into a hound. But if you hoped the father would stay that way long enough for you to get acquainted with him, divest your mind of that thought. Before night he had returned to his trim side whiskers and curly hair, while Fritz had shrunk in length, broadened in girth, A RCHITECT AND BUILDER and put on long trousers that were too short for him and heavy shoes.

And so the pictures run. The father changes his clothes, his beard and his hair at least once, and often two or three times a day, Fritz is a good second in this kaleidoscopic performance, the mother facially runs through all the races and exhibits a bewildering number of different costumes, the little boys must have been branded or their parents would never have been able to keep track of them, so extraordinary were the changes they underwent, and the dogs offered enough varieties to have given a capital bench show. The "one hundred illustrations" were altogether the most entertaining things about the copy of "The Swiss Family Robinson" over which the boy
